FELIX

Rest in Peace

PUT TO DEATH BY OXFORD UNIVERSITY

Felix was a primate who was imprisoned inside Oxford University for a year and was subjected to horrific experiments before being put to death by those that had tormented him.

His tormentors had given him the name 'Felix' which in Latin means happy. It is a sick 'in joke' by Oxford University vivisectionists, who no doubt found it amusing to call him such a perverse name, considering the pain and suffering that Felix was about to be forced to endure.

For a year Felix was held alone in a cage, a cage he could barely move around in. Felix was kept apart from his kin and was 'conditioned', using food rewards by his tormentors to do a series of tests. Conditioned means they starved him and only gave him food if he complied with their wishes.

Felix was then fitted with a cranial chamber (a box like contraption that sits on top of the skull). His pain must have been unbearable but he had no one to comfort him. Just a barren cage surrounded him. There was no kin to cuddle up to, to ease his pain. He was alone until the day his torturers had finished with him; the day they put him to death.

Felix's final few months would have been filled with pain, torment, and much suffering. Felix had the top of his skull sliced off and electrodes were forced into his brain.

Felix in his 'chair' awaits his daily torment

Oxford University have the audacity to label themselves as an institution of 'academic excellence'! However, the reality is that the life Felix was forced to endure has nothing to do with 'academia', but everything to do with arrogance; an arrogance of individuals who hold life so cheap, that they can dictate not just how and when to end a sentient life, but how much suffering they can and will inflict upon that life.

Help us to help the thousands of other animals like Felix currently suffering inside Oxford University
