REMEMBER GEORGE

Kidnapped... Imprisoned... Blinded... Killed

STOP THE OXFORD ANIMAL LAB

George was a wild-caught macaque monkey. Once he would have been roaming free in the Tanzanian tundra, the sugar plantations of Mauritius or the jungles of Indonesia and China.

Wrenched from his home, George was transported to the laboratory where he was forced to endure the most extreme brutality and suffering at Oxford University. The professor at Oxford University who named him 'George' abused him for years before he finally killed him.

The only reason we actually know about George is because someone inside Oxford University was so appalled at how George suffered that they were compelled to tell his story so that his death would not be in vain.

We have been told that – when talking to an audience - the professor in question (who had been investigated by police in November 2005 for cruelty to a monkey on whom he was experimenting) appeared to exhibit great satisfaction in detailing the injuries he had caused George.

The professor's 'work' on George had involved causing him extensive injuries, including blinding him. When telling his story to the assembled group, the vivisector laughed before he concluded his account, recalling that after he had blinded George, part of the experiment had been to then take George out into the University Park.

Vivisectors like to talk about how much they care about the animals they torture and eventually kill. This man's attitude shows this is far from the truth. He made a mockery of the suffering of a smaller, weaker creature. George is not the first animal to have been brutalised by Oxford University vivisectors, nor will he be the last.

George died alone, blind, afraid and imprisoned in a barren cage hardly big enough for him to stand up in, denied the freedom into which he was born.

George can't be brought back, nor can we take away the suffering he experienced imprisoned inside Oxford University, but what we can and MUST do is to stop countless others suffering his fate. If Oxford University are allowed to build their new animal research centre, it is inevitable that thousands more will endure what George endured.

Say NO to the Oxford Lab. Say YES to a science based on compassion and a science that actually works.
